THE LAST EVENING

Cavendish House. Grosvenor Square, Mayfair. 6 AM, the morning of November 15th.

The chambermaid drew back the library curtains. Lady Constance Cavendish, seventy-three, lay slumped over the writing desk. The fountain pen had rolled to the carpet. A teacup, half-finished, was cold in its saucer. The doctor would later confirm asphyxiation.

Three generations of Cavendish in this house. Edward Cavendish, her father, took possession of the property in 1872. Lord Henry, her late husband, hung the family portraits. Constance had been the last of them, alone for eleven years. Above the desk, a signed photograph of Edward VII, taken in this very library in 1909. It had not been moved in seventeen years.

The household guest book sat open on the secretary's desk. Forty-six years of names. A page of new entries, in her own hand, the ink not yet dry. The guests Constance had received at her last dinner.

Detective Hartmann arrives at half past six. He closes the door behind the doctor. He picks up the guest book. He knows the killer's name is in there. He knows he will not finish it alone.

THE GUEST BOOK

Hartmann places the open guest book on the desk in front of you.

"Edward Cavendish started this book in 1873. Lord Henry kept it the same way after he died. Constance after him. Every dinner, every ball, every guest who crossed that threshold for fifty-three years. Three generations of method. I have mine."

He turns the first page.

"I spent the night on it. Seventeen clues, no more. All of them point to the same name. You will find them on the two pages that follow. Read them one at a time. For each clue, cross out every name that fails it. A pencil is enough. Strike through, turn the page, keep going."

He pauses.

"There is an eighteenth clue. It isn't in the pages. It is in the guest book. Yours to find."

Hartmann stands.

"The guest book is yours. Cross out the innocent."

■

Apply the clues that follow in the order you prefer. Each one eliminates part of the names in the guest book.

CHAPTER 1

BOND STREET

Cavendish Silks. The flagship store, midway down New Bond Street. Mr. Wilkes, the manager, has worked the counter for twenty-six years. He saw Lady Constance for the last time on the afternoon of the 13th. She had come in to approve the silks for the autumn collection. She left at four. She was, as always, alone.

"She had no enemies, Inspector. Not a soul in Mayfair would have wished her ill."

Hartmann lets the silence work. Mr. Wilkes folds and unfolds a length of damson velvet. After a moment, he adds, almost to himself: "She did not seem herself, that day. She would not look at the gold thread. She had always loved the gold."

There is something in Bond Street that Constance had been avoiding.
