THE LAST EVENSONG

No. 11 The Circus, Bath. A Saturday in mid-September, the Festival weekend, 5.20pm. On the first-floor writing desk three numbered loan-cards lay beside the ink-blotter, and Lady Imogen Pendarvis had just put down her pen.

She was seventy-one, retired Keeper of Costume at the Holburne and Honorary Archivist of the benefactor roll. The cards were B-1989-37, B-1991-04 and B-1993-22. Beside them the Combe Down limestone paperweight held the corner of the blotter. Three lines on Holburne stationery, ink only just dry.

The doorbell rang at 5.25pm. She let her visitor in, then sat down again at the desk. They spoke for eleven minutes. When she rose a second time to fetch the carafe, a footstep closed in behind her.

The paperweight came down once. She fell sideways onto the Aubusson rug beneath the writing desk. The desk-clock showed 5.38pm. Across the rooftops the Klais organ opened the Autumn Saturday recital at the Abbey.

In the morning the housekeeper found her. Mrs Mowbray had let herself in for the Sunday silver and gone up to the writing room. Inspector Hartmann reached No. 11 The Circus at 9.10am. DS Catherine Pellow was on the kerb.

THE BENEFACTOR ROLL

By mid-morning the Holburne donor list was on Hartmann's desk in Keynsham. Pellow stood at his shoulder. He set the register flat. He did not rush.

Lady Imogen had kept the list for forty years. Givers. Lenders. Patrons. By hand at first, then on a screen. She was the last to know every name.

'Forty-seven thousand first names. One is the killer of Lady Imogen.'

Hartmann turned the cover back.

'I have drawn seventeen clues from the case. They narrow the name to one.'

He closed the book and slid it across the desk.

'The list is yours. Cross out the innocent.'

CHAPTER 1

THE BATH STONE

Mrs Mowbray was on her knees on the staircase landing of No. 11 The Circus when Hartmann arrived. The brass rod was halfway up the carpet; the silver-polish cloth was in her hand. The writing-room door at the top of the stair stood partly open.

She was Welsh, sixty-two, twenty-three years at the Pendarvis house. She got up and brought the inspector into the small parlour at the back.

'Lord have mercy, Inspector. The room's just as her ladyship left it. I've not touched a thing.'

She had let herself in at 7.40am for the Sunday silver. The doorstep had been clean. She had swept it herself on the Saturday morning before she left.

'Mrs Mowbray.' Pellow looked up from her notebook. 'Any visitors on the Saturday?'

'A lady in a Regency walking-dress came up Brock Street about five. I was on the bus to Twerton by then, but Mrs Lyle two doors down saw her from her sash window. She thought she was one of the Festival lot.' Mrs Mowbray folded her hands. 'Fair play to Mrs Lyle. She has an eye for that street.'

Hartmann asked about the writing desk.

'The paperweight was back in its place. The bureau drawer was open. Her ladyship had pulled three cards from the bottom file on the Friday. She said they wanted a quiet look before the trustees.' She smoothed a crease in her apron. 'Tidy enough on the Saturday morning, she was. Cards on the desk, sherry in the carafe. Not a thing out of place.'

In all that time she had never known the desk drawer left open.
