

Prologue

There are many things in this world humans were never meant to see. Being confronted with those things would blow their narrow minds completely.

One of these things is the meaning of life, of course.

Humans are protected from this by their own incapability of ever seeing the whole picture.

Some of the things don't wish to harm people, and for this reason they just never show themselves. Humans will never know what these things are.

People are also blessed to not see what they aren't looking for. Some things don't mind harming them, but it is not their goal, so they just go on with their business, and every now and then a human does see such a thing but isn't believed by other humans because they haven't ever seen it themselves. Simply because they weren't looking for it.

These people are usually depicted as mad, which, after seeing what they never should have seen, they most likely are.

And then there are things humans are never supposed to see, never supposed to be confronted with, but which show themselves on purpose. They show themselves in the most horrible ways possible. Humans see these things most often, out of all the things they are not supposed to see, and they will turn mad or tell themselves more logical lies in order to stay sane.

They allow themselves only to see, and kind of understand a very small piece of what they have seen.

This is all probably for the best.

There is no other explanation available as to why these things want to harm people besides, they are just deep, deep evil.

That it is just the dark side of the world, and it is just that evil something that causes so many bad things in the world.

Just horrible, horrible things.

Some people believe there is a deeper meaning. They are scared of the idea that something could just be evil for no other reason than that it is evil. But they have no idea what that reason could be.

A human could never think of another explanation than just evil. But then again, maybe humans aren't seeing the whole picture of this either.

One thing everybody who thinks about this often seems to agree on, is that it is probably better not to know.
